INTRODUCTION
By Virgil Barker

The really important personalities of this time, now obscured by dust-clouds of opinions, will stand out sharp and clear when the air has been washed by the rain of years. As the dust is laid, it will become plain past all denial that Abbott Thayer was a personage as monumental and enduring as Monadnock itself. He was so by virtue of certain qualities which, occurring in just the combination they did, would have made him great in any age; in this they made him uniquely great.

To portray him as an important painter is to fall short of the whole truth concerning him. It is more nearly adequate to point out that he was a great soul using paint as his means of communication. Though he was entirely aware of the sheer pleasure of manipulating pigment, his primary loyalty was given to that which it could express—which it must express if he were to labor with it to the end. He never belittled himself in any trivial game of "art for art's sake"; with him always paint was a language by which to convey something. And the medium gave him most satisfaction when it did not attract attention to itself but allowed the long-pondered conception to shine.

He was spirit-brother to a certain Chinese painter whose work was done before the year 1370. This man, Wang Li, made many studies of Hua Mountain, but for a long time his efforts to paint his "idea" of that mountain came to nothing. Therefore, he says,* "... I brooded upon it in the quiet of my house, on my walks abroad, in bed and at meals, at business, at concerts, in intervals of conversation and literary composition. One day when I was resting I heard drums and flutes passing the door. I leapt up like a madman and cried ‘I have got it!’ Then I tore up my old sketches and painted it again. This time my only guide was Hua Mountain itself . . .’’ Had Thayer lived long enough to see those words in print, his own heart would have leapt in sympathy and exultant understanding; for some such psychological experience he must have had with old Monadnock. That is why the susceptible spectator, in looking at his painting, senses in it something more majestic than any momentary aspect of physical nature, a grandeur that has its source in the depths of all being.

It is the same throughout the entire range of Thayer’s mature achievement. A bowl of roses in his hands becomes more than a flower-piece; it is a glimpse into the very center of beauty. And Thayer’s pictures of human beings do not, like the average portrait, show us people who may or may not be interesting, according as they are known to us or as they exhibit individuality; nor are his figure-pieces mere arrangements to satisfy the eye with the pattern they make on the canvas. Rather do they amaze us with glimpses of what is possible to our human kind at our best—the purity of girlhood, the responsiveness of boyhood, the deep purposiveness of young manhood, the glory of womanhood. The finest line ever penned by Dr. Johnson is,

‘‘Thy soul completes the triumph of thy face.’’

Thayer’s pictures of women triumph in portraying the face and the soul as one. The secret of his angels is that they did not come down to us from some far-removed heaven but rose up from the midst of us and sit brooding on the mystery and the splendor of our human life.

With such an attitude towards his art, with such aims dictating the form of his every creation, Thayer succeeded in expressing something above the reach of the majority who paint. In a generation for the most part content with technical proficiency, he went beyond the making of pictures; in an age of painters he was an artist. He brought to bear upon each task the weight and comprehensive force of a great mind. Working always in a style intensely personal, he never cheapened it by exploiting his personality. His paintings are not the clever product of an assertive egotism, but imaginative apprehensions of hidden beauty. He spent his life in rendering not appearances but the reality behind appearances.

The precise aspect under which he visualized that reality may be defined as spiritual nobility. Looking upon the visions which Thayer has bequeathed to us, we respond to them with the feeling which Carlyle wisely praised as good for man—the feeling of reverence. It is only fitting that a fair portion of that reverence should be directed toward their creator so recently among us; but it is better, and more as Thayer would have it, that we should adore the art, the idea in the art, and by emotional contagion share its inspiring power. The finest works of Thayer’s hands possess the inexhaustible youth of spiritual beauty; along with the creations of the elder gods of art, they burn upwards—
